Special Issue “Working Under the Conditions of a Pandemic” in the German Journal of Work and Organizational Psychology (Zeitschrift für Arbeits- und Organisationspsychologie) 3/2021

Editors: Oliver Weigelt, Bernd Marcus, Jörg Felfe, and Annette Kluge

Description

The arrangements made by governments and local administrations around the globe to contain the corona pandemic led to massive changes in organizations. These changes in work and organizational processes came unexpectedly. The lockdown caused the discontinuation of production lines, reduced work hours, lack of and/or extensive use of protection devices, and unemployment, but also led to newly established home offices or mobile workplaces, the use of digital teamwork tools, and new meeting cultures. Leadership turned into virtual leadership and corporate communication have to find new ways to coordinate activities. An overview of current studies carried out by I/O-psychological working groups can be found at https://www.bwl.uni-rostock.de/institut/lehrstuehle/abwl-organisations-und-personalpsychologie-prof-dr-bernd-marcus/forschung/

To give space to the publication of research results which have arisen from the current corona crisis, the editorial team of the German Journal of Work and Organizational Psychology is planning a thematic issue with the working title "Working under the conditions of a pandemic."

Possible topics

- Stress and support factors in the home office
- Leading and leadership
- Technology-based collaboration, virtual teamwork
- Mental stress and strain
- Health and health programs
- Motivation, flow, and satisfaction
- Reduced work hours, job insecurity
- Innovation and creativity
- Change in consumer behavior (e.g., hoarding)
- Work processes/routines and work-life balance
